Wooden Water Pipes more Durable than Lead, if laid Deep Enough. Some wooden pipes laid down for conducting water at Springfield, Mass., appear to demonstrate the last that they are more durable, if laid deep enough, than pipes made of lead. This plan is to lay them at such a depth as to This plan is to lay them at successful the prevent atmospheric action. In sandy or portion ous earth lay them six feet deep; in compact soil four feet deep, and in peaty or swampy soil three feet deep. In one place heavy lead pipe was laid through a wet meadow, and it required repairs in four years, and had to be lifted in ten. It was replaced by wooden pipes which have now been twenty years in use, and are in good condition yet. The aqueduct pipes which supply Springfield with water have been in use fourteen years, and are still in good order. They are bored logs, the opening being seven inches to bord the property of the property of the period of the property of the period of the property of the period of

It is undoubtedly true that timber sunk deep enough beneath the surface of the earth, and kept from contact with the air, enduros for centuries. Cedar logs taken from the Jersey swamps, in which they have reposed for a thou-eand years, are found to be fresh and strong. Wooden pipes are cheaper than those of metal and are preferable on account of the unpleasant taint that lead gives the water.
